Introduction

The production and logistical infrastructure associated with the manufacture and consumption of petroleum products in Canada is generally poorly understood. With growing interest and activity regarding the development of renewable fuels, carbon pricing, a clean fuel standard, and other regulations, there is a need for stakeholders such as government, renewable fuels producers, and the petroleum downstream (refining and marketing) industry to better understand this infrastructure.

This report is an update to a 2007 study that provided an inventory and analysis of Canada's downstream petroleum logistical infrastructure, including: refineries, fuel terminals, bulk plant facilities, cardlock sites, as well as distribution of petroleum products by pipeline, rail, sea, and road. This update includes more detailed information on refineries, biofuel production facilities, biofuel blending, trans-shipment facilities, and airport fuel storage.

This report does not provide information on direct importers of fuel and their methods, marine fuel, as well as some aspects of aviation fuel such as biofuel blending. There is limited available information to support reporting in these areas and in some cases, they represent emerging areas within the supply chain. We plan to further pursue reporting in these areas in future updates to this report.

In the preparation of this report, we have benefited from the cooperation of several downstream industry organizations which provided much of the data and information presented herein. We are grateful for their support. All data in this report is current as of December 31st, 2016.

Disclaimer

The narrative and data contained in this report was prepared on the basis of participation by numerous organizations involved in downstream logistical operations. Overview

The logistical infrastructure associated with the manufacture, transport, storage, and sale of petroleum products consists of several key elements:

- Refineries;
- Biofuel plants;
- Pipelines;
- Marine transportation (ships and barges);
- Rail transportation;
- Primary storage and distribution terminals;
- Renewable fuel blending locations;
- Biofuel trans-shipment facilities;
- Bulk plant (tertiary) storage facilities;
- Airport storage facilities;
- Road transport “tanker trucks”; and
- “End-Use” facilities (gas stations, cardlocks, FBO’s¹) and customer-based storage/fueling facilities.

In Canada, the movement of petroleum products generally occurs within three regional areas of supply. These supply “orbits” are generally defined by supply infrastructure (such as pipelines); while there is a great deal of product movement within these regions, there is usually little refined product shipped inter-regionally. Figure 2 illustrates the geographic range of these supply regions, which encompasses Western, Central and Atlantic Canada.

This report outlines Canadian refined petroleum infrastructure, storage capacity, modes of transportation, and regional aggregated product flows and throughputs. It also provides information on biofuel production, transport, storage, and blending. Unless noted, volumes are expressed in cubic metres, which is the equivalent of 1000 litres or 6.29 U.S. barrels.

Refining Infrastructure

A petroleum refinery converts crude oil into marketable petroleum products such as gasoline and diesel fuel. By this definition, there are fourteen such “complex” refineries in Canada (Figure 3, Annex A and B). In addition, there are a number of upgraders located in Alberta and Saskatchewan that are associated with Canada’s oilsands (the principal source of feedstock for upgraders). Generally, heavy oil upgraders convert bitumen into lighter “synthetic” crude oil (or SCO), and are typically not considered as refineries per se; they are included in Annex A however, since some upgraders are able to produce limited types of finished products such as diesel.

According to the data collected for this study, the total production capacity of Canada’s complex refineries in 2016 was just over 300 thousand cubic metres (just under 2 million barrels) per day. Atlantic Canada had the most refinery capacity at 37 percent of the total, followed by the Western region at 34 percent, and Central region at 29 percent.

Canadian refineries produced at roughly 82 percent of total production capacity² in 2016. Regionally, Atlantic Canada had utilization rates around 85 percent of total capacity, while both Western and Central Canadian refineries produced at roughly 80 percent of their capacity. Utilization rates varied significantly by facility, with some refiners producing above 95 percent of their capacity, while others were well below an 80 percent rate of utilization.

A significant proportion of total domestic refinery outputs in 2016 was in the form of gasoline and diesel fuel (roughly 70 percent); the balance included aviation fuel, heavy fuel oil, light fuel oil, lubricants, and petrochemical feedstocks.

Refinery Feedstock

Refineries utilize crude oil as their primary feedstock, the types of crudes generally reflecting each refinery's process capabilities (complexity), the yields required to meet demand for refined products outputs, and the acquisition cost of the available crude options.

Crude oil can broadly be categorized as either "light" or "heavy". Light crude oils have a higher API gravity³ (generally above 30 degrees), and would include conventionally produced crudes such as Canada Light Sweet, WTI, and Brent, as well as synthetic light crudes such as SCO that are manufactured at upgrading facilities. Heavy crudes have lower API gravity,⁴ and can range from the heaviest non-upgraded bitumen to crudes such as Western Canada Select⁵ (WCS) or other conventionally produced heavy crudes.

A refiner can invest in process units that allow for the conversion of heavier crude oils into the required yields to meet the demand for gasoline. This type of investment may be warranted where a refiner has reliable access to heavy crude supply, since heavier crudes are generally less expensive.

According to our survey, Canadian refinery feedstocks vary considerably by region, mainly due to differences in refinery process capabilities⁶ and crude type availability through pipeline access. On average, just below 40 percent of Western Canadian refinery inputs are categorized as heavy crudes, while the remaining 60 percent are considered light crude (two-thirds of which is SCO, with the remainder being conventional light crude). There is an abundance of heavy crude produced in Western Canada which is available to regional refiners either in its heavy form, or as a lighter SCO after its conversion through the upgrading process.⁷

³ A measure of a crude's "thickness" according to a scale developed by the American Petroleum Institute

⁴ Generally below 20 degrees.

⁵ A heavy crude blend produced in Western Canada.

⁶ To be addressed in more detail in the following section.

⁷ There are six facilities that perform upgrading in Western Canada (and none elsewhere in Canada). These facilities are often located at or nearby existing refineries, and serve as a feedstock source for SCO.

Central Canadian refinery feedstock inputs are generally somewhat lighter than those in the West, with roughly 75 percent being light crude (most as conventional light, and a smaller percentage as SCO), and roughly 25 percent categorized as heavy crude.

A slightly higher percentage of refinery feedstocks in Atlantic Canada are considered light crude oil, some of which are domestically produced, but the majority being imported. Refineries here are generally configured to handle some heavier crudes and there is flexibility in feedstock options because of the access to crude oil imports.

Refinery Processes and Capabilities

The capacities of various integral refinery process units can affect the types of crude feedstocks selected, and will partly determine the quantity and quality of refined product yields. As such, more complex refineries provide more flexibility to produce products that meet a broader range of regulatory specifications.

The principal processes common to most conventional refineries are:

- Atmospheric Distillation: is the most basic and fundamental process, involving the separation of crude oil into various hydrocarbon streams through a distillation column. The feedstock for this process is crude oil, and the outputs are a range of hydrocarbon streams from the heaviest (often referred to as residuals), to lighter distillate or gasoline components, as well as butane or other gaseous hydrocarbons. Since all crude oil that is processed at a refinery effectively begins with atmospheric distillation, atmospheric distillation capacity is typically what is cited as that refinery's overall capacity.
- Vacuum Distillation: takes heavy residuals as feedstock from atmospheric distillation through a similar process, but under vacuum conditions. This allows for lower process temperatures, thereby reducing undesirable chemical reactions. The primary outputs of this process (light vacuum and heavy vacuum gas oils) are inputs for cracking processes, while the vacuum residue (the heaviest components) are often fed to asphalt production or coking units.
- Catalytic or Thermal Cracking: involves the breaking of carbon bonds in heavier hydrocarbons by using heat and catalysts, to produce smaller, lighter hydrocarbons such as those found in gasoline. Effectively, cracking units allow for higher yields of gasoline and diesel from heavier crude oils. The feedstock for catalytic cracking units are the vacuum gas oils and residuals from the distillation processes.
- Hydrocracking: is another form of cracking that introduces an input of hydrogen, mainly taking cracked gas oils, and producing yields of higher quality gasoline and distillate components. Not all refineries have hydrocracking units as they are relatively expensive to build and operate, but with the benefit of adding flexibility to product yields.

- Coking: upgrades the heaviest residual hydrocarbons into petroleum coke and higher value products.
- Catalytic Reforming: is mainly used to increase the octane value of gasoline blending streams.
- Isomerization: is mainly used to raise the octane value of gasoline blending streams.
- Alkylation: takes lighter hydrocarbons and converts them into higher quality gasoline blending components.
- Hydrotreating: is used to treat or remove impurities from refinery streams, and is a critical component for the removal of sulphur from gasoline and diesel.

Complex refineries have more secondary (i.e. beyond simple distillation) refining capacity, meaning they would have more capacity for cracking, coking, etc., and thereby more capacity to produce a broader and more flexible range of products from a more flexible range of crude feedstocks. Refinery complexity is often expressed as the Nelson index, which ranges from between two and five for simple refineries, to eight and higher for more complex facilities.

Canadian refineries are generally more complex, most having a Nelson index between 7 and 13, but there are some differences in regional complexity. Figure 4 shows the total capacity of Canadian refineries by region compared to their cracking capacities, which is representative of their complexity. Central and Western refineries have slightly more cracking capacity as a percentage of total refinery capacity (roughly 46 percent) compared to Atlantic Canada (roughly 32 percent).

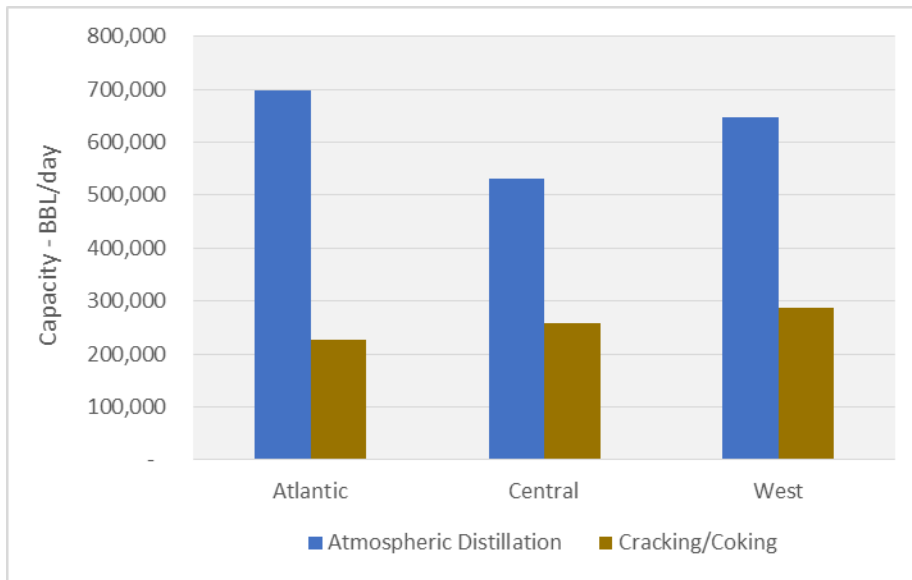

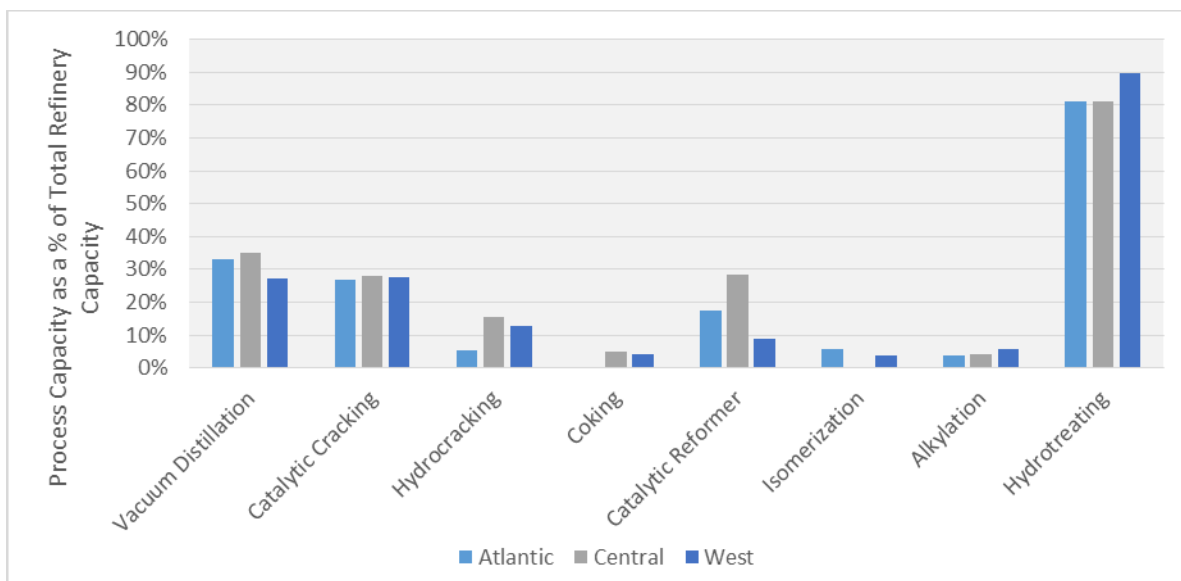

Figure 5 lists the regional capacities for Canadian refinery process units expressed as a percentage of the total refinery capacity. Hydrotreating capacity has become a point of emphasis for refiners over the last few years as more robust sulphur regulations were introduced. While there is generally more hydrotreating capacity needed for refiners that process heavier crudes (such as in the West and Central regions), there may be incremental investments needed to meet more stringent regulatory requirements.

Biofuel Plants

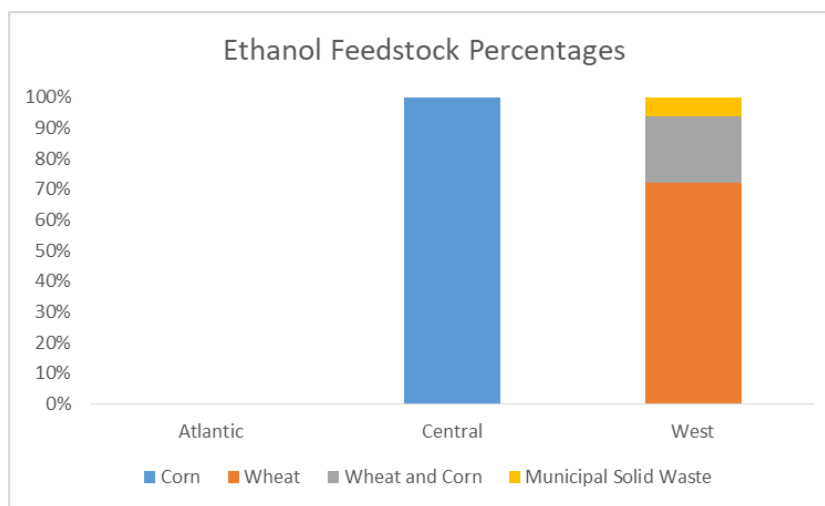

Biofuels in their various forms are used in the Canadian petroleum sector to blend renewable content into fossil fuels, to comply with renewable fuel (or other) regulations. Ethanol content is federally mandated at five percent of the national gasoline pool, although Saskatchewan and Manitoba have higher provincial mandates, at 7.5 percent and 8.5 percent, respectively. Biodiesel is typically blended with diesel and is currently mandated at two percent of the national diesel pool.

Biofuel production capacity has grown significantly over the last decade: about two million cubic metres in 2016 for ethanol, and about 650,000 cubic metres for biodiesel. There are currently 26 operational⁸ biofuel production facilities in Canada. All of these facilities are located in Central and Western Canada: seven ethanol plants in the Central and nine in the West region, and seven biodiesel plants in the Central region and three in the West region. There are no biofuel facilities located in Atlantic Canada.

The average Canadian ethanol production facility has a capacity of 125,000 cubic metres annually (or 2,200 barrels per day); Central region plants average more than two times the capacity of those in the West. By comparison, the average biodiesel facility has a capacity of 66,000 cubic metres annually, with Western biodiesel plants averaging nearly twice the production capacity of Central region facilities.

Utilization rates⁹ for Canadian ethanol plants were relatively high in 2016, averaging near 90 percent, while 2016 utilization rates for biodiesel plants were about 70 percent, with some plants producing at full capacity while others produced at far lower rates because of reported feedstock issues.

⁸ Not including demonstration scale facilities.

⁹ A measure of plant production as a percent of the total plant capacity.

The main feedstock for ethanol production varies by region, and generally relate to the predominant crops grown in that area. Central Canadian plants use corn exclusively, as this is an abundant regional crop, whereas Western Canada uses wheat as its primary feedstock.

Biodiesel feedstocks were more diverse among Central Canadian production plants, as a majority utilized a range of vegetable oils and animal fats versus used oils or greases. Western Canada biodiesel plants primarily utilized canola oil and a limited amount of used oils or greases.

Refined Product Pipelines

Transporting large quantities of petroleum products, whether over a short distance or over hundreds of kilometers, is most cost-effectively accomplished through pipelines, with marine transportation being the most effective means in areas not served by pipelines. Pipelines and ships/barges are therefore the two main logistical links between refineries and the distribution terminals that receive and store products.

In Western and Central Canada, pipelines serve as a critical mode for refined products, whereas marine shipping is the principal mode in Atlantic Canada. Annex C provides details of Canada's pipeline infrastructure, which in summary accounts for product movements:

- From Alberta's refineries to Burnaby (TransMountain Pipeline)
- From Alberta's refineries to Western Canada (Enbridge Pipeline)
- From Montreal to Toronto (TransNorthern)
- From Nanticoke to Toronto (TransNorthern)

Some of these pipelines, such as the TransMountain line, can carry both crude and refined products, while others such as the TransNorthern pipelines, transport only refined petroleum products. Various types and grades of petroleum products are taken into a pipeline in successive “batches” and delivered into terminals connected to the pipeline at several nodes and at the distal end. Figure 8 and Figure 9 depict the production and distribution infrastructure connected by pipelines in the Central and Western Canadian regions.

Primary Distribution Terminals

Distribution terminals receive petroleum products into their inventories from refineries – usually via pipeline or ship – and then discharge the products onto trucks, ships, or rail cars to be delivered to end-use customers, or to be re-distributed to secondary storage facilities.

Two types of facilities perform a storage and distribution role for petroleum products in Canada:

- Primary terminals, which handle larger volumes, and are typically the first point of storage and distribution after the refinery; and
- Bulk plants, which handle smaller volumes, and typically receive product from a primary terminal versus a refinery (see following section).

Terminal ownership and operation

Forty years ago, petroleum marketers maintained dedicated networks of primary distribution terminals. Today, marketers often operate from common terminals in order to reduce overall operating costs, with the terminal operator receiving a fee from the organizations lifting product from their terminal. Although terminal fees are not publicly advertised, they are generally very small – a small fraction of a cent per litre.

Refiners account for the ownership of all but a few independent Canadian terminals. These independent terminal operators operate their facilities as a service for hire, rather than as an integrated part of an existing supply chain.

Primary terminals tend to be large facilities with considerable storage capacity and product throughput capacity, typically located close to more populated areas. Conversely, less-populated areas are often served by secondary distribution facilities such as bulk plants.

Table 1 details Canadian primary terminals by owner/operator and by province.

Terminal storage facilities

The average Canadian terminal refined product capacity was 60,000 cubic metres,¹⁰ and was fairly consistent between the identified regions in Canada.

Terminals in Canada generally consist of anywhere from 3 to 50 floating or fixed-roof tanks. From the data obtained for this survey, the average individual tank size at a terminal storage facility was roughly 7,700 cubic metres, but were reported as small as 32 cubic metres, and up to 26,600 cubic metres.

Total Canadian refined product inventories averaged 7.6 million cubic metres¹¹ in 2016, which equates to roughly 26 days of supply for all finished products. According to our analysis of total national terminal and bulk storage capacity data, this translates to an average storage utilization rate of roughly 80 percent for refined products.

The products held by Canadian terminals includes both petroleum products and renewable fuels. The most common product stored at Canadian terminals in 2016 was gasoline (roughly 52 percent), either in the form of gasoline, or as a blendstock, ultimately to be blended with ethanol. Distillate fuels (including diesel and other fuel oils) made up 36 percent of product stored at Canadian terminals, and renewable fuels made up under 5 percent of Canadian terminal throughputs.

Product receipts into terminals

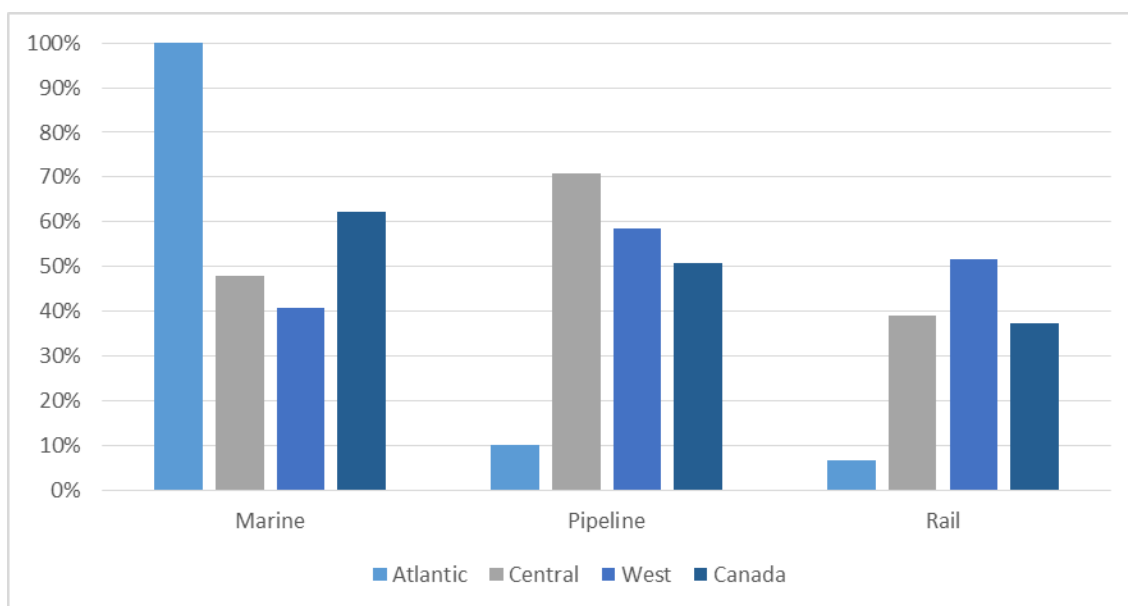

Most of the 14 gasoline producing refineries in Canada have a co-located terminal (i.e. connected by a short distance of pipeline). There are approximately 70 other primary terminals throughout Canada, most of which are geographically separated from the refineries that supply them. Terminals that are not co-located with a refinery typically receive supply by pipeline or marine transportation. A small number of terminals that are further removed from refinery production and are not connected to pipelines or marine access, may receive supply from rail shipments.

¹⁰ The average terminal capacities is dependent on the type of terminal storage included in the averaging calculation. Some terminals discharge most of their inventory into pipelines to be delivered to other terminals, and these tend to have larger capacities. If those terminals are included, the average is roughly 90,000M³, and if they are excluded to focus on terminals that primarily distribute to end-use customers, the average size is roughly 60,000 M³.

There are significant regional differences in the product receipt capabilities of Canadian terminals (Figure 10). All reporting terminals in Atlantic Canada received product via marine shipment; however, those same terminals had limited access to pipelines, and very few had the ability to receive product by rail. In contrast, the majority of reporting terminals in Central and Western Canada receive product via pipeline, roughly half can receive product by rail, and far fewer have access to marine supply.

Our survey and analysis showed that in 2016, Canadian primary terminals received just over 60 percent of their refined product supply via pipeline, nearly 30 percent by marine transport, and less than 10% by either rail or tanker-truck.

In 2016, domestic sales of refined products were just over 105 million cubic metres, or 288 thousand cubic metres per day.¹² This included all types of finished petroleum products such as gasoline, diesel fuel, aviation fuels, as well as heavy and light fuel oil, and incorporated domestic refinery production and imports. Gasoline made up the largest portion of petroleum products sales, at 45 percent, followed by diesel fuel at 28 percent.

The vast majority of refined products sold by Canadian refiners (or via refined product imports) move through a primary terminal. The regional distribution of terminal throughputs directed to end-use customers is generally aligned with regional consumption (or domestic sales) of refined products (Figure 11).

*This represents terminals selling primarily to end-use customers and is estimated by submitted regional terminal throughput and capacity data.

Estimated using Statistics Canada consumption data and Kent detailed volumetric sales data to prorate Quebec's sales into East and Central regions.

Estimated using NEB data on regional crude runs at Canadian refineries, and specific refinery throughput data to prorate Quebec refinery production into East and Central Region

Atlantic Canada's terminal throughputs to end-use customers were far lower than their associated refinery production, because a large portion of the refinery outputs were exported, and some refined product from this region was likely shipped into the Central region to be re-distributed through primary terminals there.

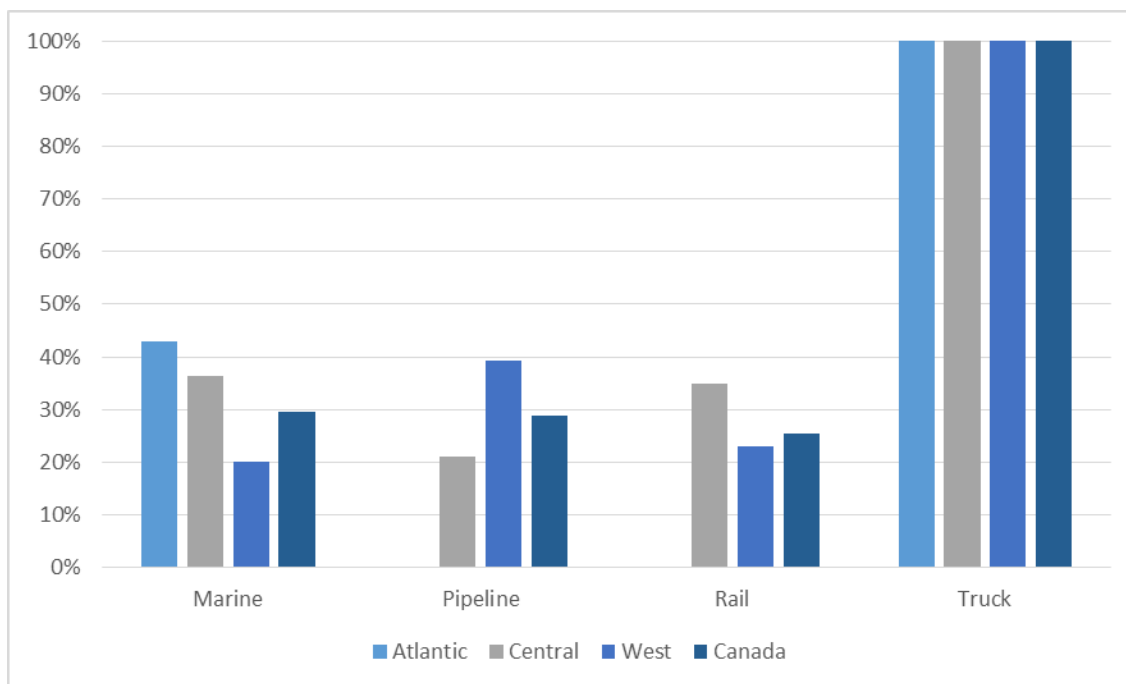

The average annualized throughput of Canadian primary terminals¹³ was 1.1 million cubic metres in 2016: slightly higher and consistent between the West and Central regions of Canada, but was lower in the Atlantic region.

¹³ Only terminals that primarily supply products to end-use customers.

Product transfer out of terminals

Excluding a small number of terminals that primarily store and re-distribute refined products (via pipeline) to other terminals, the vast majority of product leaves primary terminals by way of tanker truck, destined for retail gas stations, cardlock stations, industrial or commercial customers, or to bulk plants.¹⁴

Data from our survey (Figure 12) shows that all Canadian primary terminals have tanker-truck offloading capabilities, while a far fewer offer pipeline, marine, or rail offloading capabilities. Atlantic Canada reported significant marine offloading capabilities; however, those same terminals lack pipeline or rail discharge options.

Storage and Blending of Biofuels at Primary Terminals

Typically, biofuels are blended into gasoline and diesel as they are discharged into the truck at the terminal. Ethanol is most often a “proportional blend” into a formulation of 10 percent ethanol and 90 percent octane-adjusted gasoline blendstock, producing an on-specification “E10” blended gasoline. Similarly, biodiesel is typically blended at a rate of 2 to 5 percent biodiesel.

¹⁴ Roughly 90 to 95 percent of product shipped to end-use customers in 2016 left a primary terminal by tanker-truck.

The majority of primary distribution terminals in Canada¹⁵ offer renewable fuels blending capabilities (nearly 60 percent), but there is significant variation by province. Roughly 70 percent of terminals in Western and Central Canada are capable of blending renewable fuels, whereas only a few terminals in Atlantic Canada have such capabilities (Table 2 and Figure 13).

Canadian ethanol production in 2016¹⁶ was expected to reach 1.8 million cubic metres, and combined with an estimated 1.0 million cubic metres of imports, would represent about 2.8 million cubic metres of Canadian ethanol consumption. This agrees with the reported 2016 volume of ethanol throughputs from Canadian primary terminals,¹⁷ and translates to an average national ethanol blend percentage of just over 6 percent.

¹⁶ According to 2016 Biofuels Annual GAIN Report, Global Agricultural Information Network

¹⁷ Estimates were extrapolated from the submitted data for receipts of ethanol into Canadian primary terminals.

*Calculated using only those terminals with submitted or estimated biofuel blending data, and from terminals that primarily supply end-use customers.

Canadian biodiesel plants produced roughly 0.45 million cubic metres of biodiesel in 2016. Imports and exports of biodiesel amounted to roughly 0.4 million cubic metres respectively, resulting in about 0.45 million cubic metres on net Canadian usage of biodiesel,¹⁸ which agrees with reported biodiesel throughputs from Canadian primary terminals over that time. The effective national blend percentage for biodiesel in 2016 was just over 2.5 percent.

Transport of biofuels by pipeline is typically not feasible because some biofuels attract water from condensation while in the line, and they are generally not shipped in large enough quantities to warrant a dedicated pipeline. Consequently, biofuels are usually transported by rail, tanker-truck, or marine, and is a reason why terminals located closer to biofuel production more frequently carry out biofuel blending.

¹⁸ Natural Resources Canada Energy Fact Book 2016-2017 and 2016 Biofuels Annual GAIN Report, Global Agricultural Information Network. This data includes imported HDRD.

Nearly all Canadian ethanol imported in 2016 originated primarily from the U.S. Midwest via rail into Central and Western Canada. Data submitted by terminal operators indicated that most ethanol is actually delivered to primary distribution terminals by tanker truck however,¹⁹ meaning that biofuels often required a change in mode of transportation, commonly referred to as trans-shipment.

Trans-shipment of Biofuels

The trans-shipment of biofuels occurs when a product in transit moves from one mode of transportation to another without intermediary storage. Biofuels are typically transported by rail or tanker truck, or less usually by barge. Shipments by rail are usually destined for a primary terminal, though are sometimes transferred to tanker-trucks before delivery to terminals that lack rail unloading facilities. Economics usually dictate the chosen mode of transportation: longer distances are more economically effected by rail, and trans-shipment facilities are utilized where terminals cannot receive rail shipments, or when load size or the timing of shipments become factors.

Data from our study indicates that the use of trans-shipment facilities is not widespread in Canada. Only 14 locations reported trans-shipment capabilities for ethanol (7 in the Western Canada and 7 in Ontario and Quebec), while 17 locations reported trans-shipment capabilities for biodiesel (11 of these locations located in the Western Canada region and the remaining 6 locations in Ontario and Quebec). There are no trans-shipment facilities in Atlantic Canada.

Bulk Plant Facilities

A bulk plant is a smaller (relative to a terminal) storage and distribution facility, usually receiving product from a primary terminal instead of from a refinery. Bulk plants are typically located in more distant markets where it would be uneconomical or impractical to deliver product to the end-use customer or retail site from a primary terminal. The vast majority of bulk plants receive product by means of tanker truck.

Unlike terminals (which are often shared facilities), bulk plants tend not to be shared; they generally serve as local sales offices, not just distribution facilities. Bulk plant operators are usually contracted on the basis of a throughput commission (when owned and operated by the brand marketer), or as independent buy/sell owner/operators under a branded supply contract, whereas terminal personnel would typically be salaried employees of the associated refiner/marketer. Overall, the number of Canadian bulk plant facilities that are owned by companies involved in the refining of petroleum products has decreased over the last decade, down roughly 20 percent. It is likely that most of these bulk plants are still operational, but may have been divested to smaller regional or independent operators.

Bulk plant storage facilities generally consist of between four and eight tanks, each with an average capacity of roughly 100,000 litres (100 cubic metres). The average Canadian bulk plant has a capacity of roughly 950 cubic meters, but there is significant variation on a regional basis. Bulk plants in Western Canada average over 1000 cubic metres, while those in Central and Atlantic regions average around half that amount (500 cubic metres).

The average Canadian bulk plant has an annual throughput of roughly 13,000 cubic metres and this is fairly consistent between provinces/regions. Based on our analysis of the data submitted by industry participants, roughly seven percent of all products discharged by a primary terminal will be redistributed through a bulk plant.

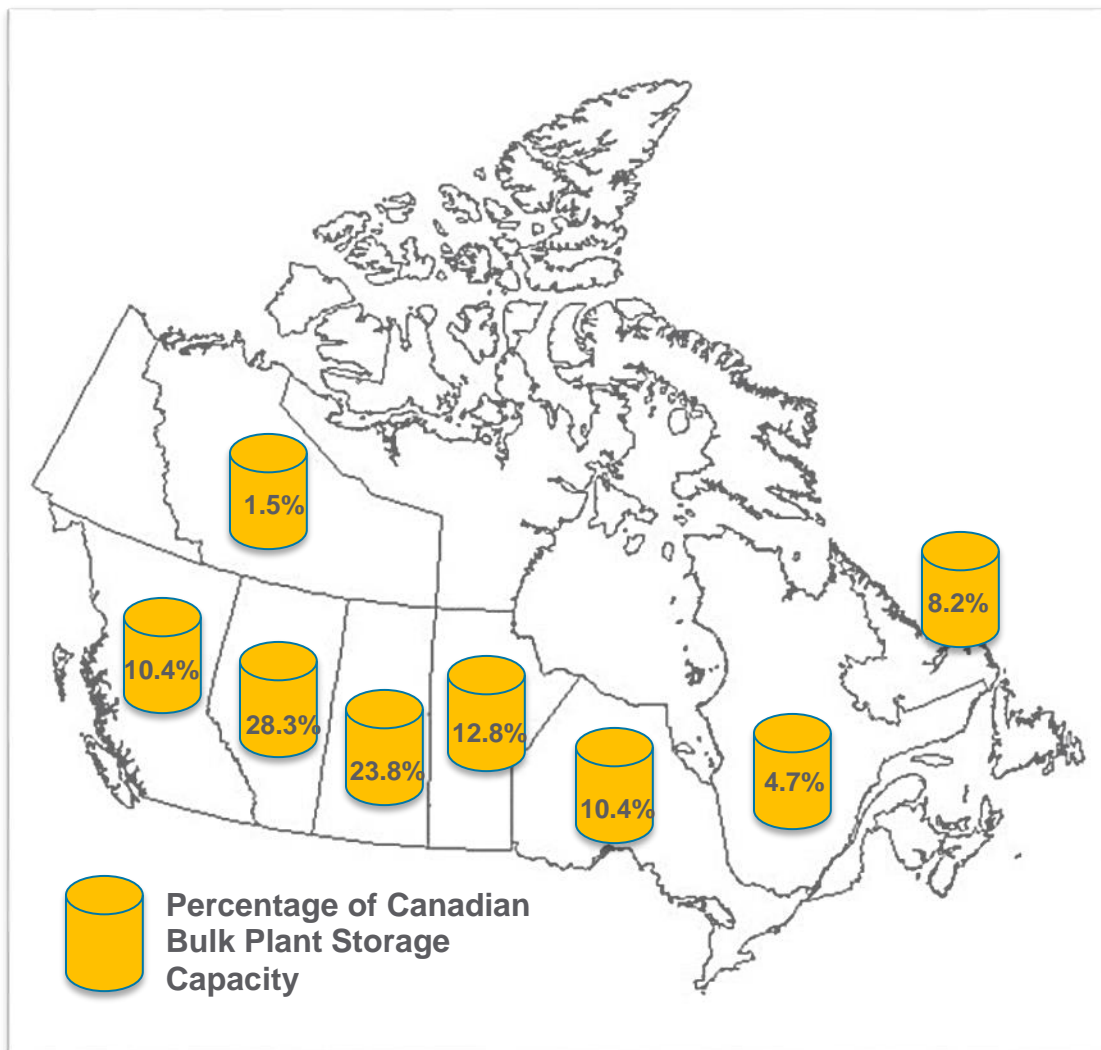

Petroleum products are almost always transferred out of a bulk plant facility by tanker trucks, and those trucks generally have a smaller capacity than a typical highway transport truck that delivers product from a primary terminal.

Biofuel blending typically does not occur at bulk plants as biofuels are generally blended before leaving the primary terminal.

Airport Petroleum Storage Facilities

Data was provided for our study from 16 major Canadian airports located in nine provinces across Canada. All of the major airports in our study have their fuel services managed by third-party organizations, enabling airlines to save costs by pooling supply and fuel management resources.

All airport fuel tank farms in this study are able to receive product by tanker truck, while some of the larger airports are able to receive product by pipeline. This would include airports located in Toronto (served by the Sarnia Products Pipeline, Trans-Northern Pipeline, and Sun Canadian Line), Montreal (Trans-Northern Pipeline), Calgary (Alberta Products Pipeline) and Vancouver (Kinder Morgan Trans-Mountain Jet Fuel Pipeline). As well, the Toronto airport is able to receive product by rail car with 26 rail car receiving positions.

All airports in this study have the ability to discharge fuel to a tanker truck, and have an average of two discharge positions. Larger airports are able to discharge product through an airport hydrant (pipeline) system: this type of system exists at airports in Toronto, Halifax, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Montreal.

Virtually all aviation fuel supplied to airport terminals is jet fuel (A-1 type), with no renewable fuel blending occurring at any of the primary Canadian airports. In 2016, 32.2 percent of jet fuel arrived at airport storage facilities by tanker truck, and 53.7 percent by pipeline.

Storage capacity at Canadian airport facilities ranges from roughly 100 to over 60,000 cubic metres with an average capacity of 11,500 cubic metres. The average major Canadian airport has five storage tanks with average size of just over 2,200 cubic metres. The average throughput at major Canadian airports in 2016 was roughly 425,000 cubic metres.

Cardlock and Other Commercial Fuel Facilities

A cardlock is a commercial version of a retail gas station, providing fuel to local and long-distance truckers. As the principal fuel used by commercial fleets, diesel is the standard offering, although many cardlocks also offer gasoline. Cardlock facilities generally provide a range of non-petroleum products and services, much in the same manner as retail gas stations. There are over 1200 cardlock facilities in Canada, as detailed in the table below and in Annex H and I.

In the past thirty years, cardlock facilities have grown from relative obscurity to become the principal means by which commercial trucking operations obtain their fuel. Prior to this, commercial fleets generally owned and maintained their own onsite fuel storage and dispensing, but with the advent of cardlocks, very few fleet operators have maintained a proprietary fueling capability.

Some commercial and industrial demand for diesel and other distillates is handled outside of the cardlock infrastructure, particularly for remote and/or off-road needs. Logging and forestry industries, for example, would rely very little on cardlock for supply.

Due to the lack of availability of total Canadian cardlock throughput data, it is difficult to estimate the proportion of cardlock vs. other means of diesel fuelling by volume. It is likely however, that cardlock operations account for roughly 70% of all diesel demand in Canada.

Marine Shipping, Rail and Road Transport Infrastructure

Marine

Movement of petroleum product by tanker ship or barge is the most efficient mode for most markets in Atlantic Canada, and in many BC coastal markets outside of the Lower Mainland. Over the past several decades, Canadian petroleum companies have largely divested themselves from owning and operating their own fleets of tankers, and now mostly depend on third-party shipping operators.

On the West Coast, due to the relatively small size of the destination ports, product is shipped almost entirely by barge. The two principal marine shippers in this region are:

- Seaspan - operates a 4,300 M³ barge, principally in support of the logistical link between Chevron's refinery in Burnaby, and Shell's terminal facility at Bare Point (near Nanaimo) among other regional terminal facilities.
- Island Tug and Barge - operates five petroleum barges (total capacity of 26,930 M³) for transport of product along the BC coastline.

On the East Coast and Great Lakes, a variety of shipping operators load product from refineries in Quebec and Atlantic Canada, for supply of marine terminals (and some bulk plants) within those regions, as well as for export to U.S. markets. Among the principal operators are:

- Algoma Tankers - operating six product tankers with a total tank capacity of 545,166 barrels (86,675 M³).
- Rigel Shipping - operating three tankers, each with a 10,500 M³ capacity.
- Irving Oil - operating four foreign-flag tank ships for export trade, and two Canadian-flag tank ships for Canadian trade (each 37,000 DWT, 'handy size').

- Coastal Shipping Ltd - a subsidiary of Woodward's, operating four tankers principally for trade in Labrador and Nunavut.

Rail

Although pipelines and marine constitute the principal mode of petroleum supply to terminals, rail is an important link for a number of terminals with no or limited access to a pipeline, or with no or only seasonal access to marine supply. Thunder Bay ON, and Terrace BC, are examples of terminal locales that receive significant product supplies by rail. CN is the principal provider of petroleum rail service in Canada, although CPR promotes an ethanol transportation capability.

Road Transport

The vast majority of petroleum products make the final part of their journey to the end-use customer or facility by means of tanker truck. Petroleum marketers and terminal operators have been trending away from in-house ownership and operation of tank truck fleets, towards the use of common carriers.

There are hundreds of common carriers involved in the transport of petroleum products across Canada, although an estimated 70 percent of terminal-originated shipments are likely serviced by the top 10-12 common carriers.

Terms and Definitions

Biodiesel: A type of diesel fuel produced from renewable sources such as vegetable oils, animal fats, or discarded cooking grease. Biodiesel can be used in its pure form (B100) or mixed with petroleum diesel where the B number indicates the percentage of biodiesel mixed.

Biofuel: A fuel type derived from renewable sources such as living matter. Common types include ethanol or biodiesel.

Biofuel Plant: A facility involved in the process of producing biofuels.

Bulk Plant: A smaller storage/distribution facility, usually receiving product from a distribution terminal (vs a refinery). Bulk plants are usually located in more distant markets where it would be uneconomical or impractical to deliver product to the end-use customer (or other petroleum facility such as a gas station) directly from a primary terminal.

CBOB: Conventional Blendstock for Oxygenate Blending also known as conventional gasoline.

Cardlock (aka Commercial Cardlock): This is the trucker's version of a retail gas station, where large commercial trucks obtain fuel. The main petroleum product sold at cardlocks is diesel fuel, but some cardlock facilities also dispense gasoline for commercial vehicles that are gasoline-powered.

Ethanol Fuel: Alcohol used as a renewable fuel source and is typically produced from the fermentation of wheat, corn or sugar cane. Ethanol in its pure form is referred to as E100 while ethanol mixed with gasoline is referenced as E% with the percentage number referring to the amount of ethanol mixed with gasoline.

M³: Cubic metres. A cubic metre is equivalent to 1000 litres, also referred to as a kilolitre (Kl). One cubic meter equals 6.29 barrels.

Marine Terminal: A terminal facility that has the capability of receiving or discharging product from/to a barge or petroleum tanker ship.

Nelson Index: A measure of the complexity of an oil refinery - the higher the value, the greater the complexity rating of the refinery. The higher the complexity rating of a refinery, the greater ability of a refinery to produce refined product from lower quality crude blends or the ability to produce higher quality finished product.

Pipeline: The primary means of moving large volumes of petroleum products over long distances. Pipelines that transport refined petroleum are either Mixed (transports crude oil at some times) or Refined only. Most refined product pipelines transport various types of fuels, although some are dedicated to one product only, such as jet fuel.

Pipeline Receipt/Delivery Points: Fixed junctions along a pipeline that either receive product from a nearby refinery or discharge product into a primary terminal facility.

RBOB/PBOB: Regular (or Premium) Blendstock for Oxygenate Blending. RBOB and PBOB are formulations of gasoline specifically for the eventual blending with Ethanol (typically 10%).

Refinery: A processing facility for the purpose of converting crude oil into marketable petroleum products. Although heavy oil upgraders (used to convert very heavy grades of crude oil into lighter “synthetic” crude oil) are typically not considered refineries, they are included here since some upgraders are able to produce certain grades of distillates that require little or no further refining.

Refining Capacity: Expressed in cubic metres per day (metric) or barrels per day (U.S.). In this report, refers to the published maximum capacity of the refinery in terms of crude oil processing by means of the crude distillation unit(s) at the refinery.

Tank Capacity/Number of Tanks: Refers to the total combined capacity and number of storage tanks at a terminal. This does not include tanks used for storing additives, slop tanks, etc.

Terminal (aka Primary Terminal, Distribution Terminal): A facility used to store inventories of refined product received from a refinery, then distributed to customers or other petroleum facilities (such as bulk plants, cardlocks, and retail gasoline outlets) via truck, barge, or rail.
